An appeals court has thrown out a patent on a revolutionary DNA-chip, ruling that nothing could be patented at all unless the inventor had a working model. The decision, by the New York-based Second Circuit Court of Appeals, overturns a ruling by the patent office a year ago that issued the patent. The patent, issued in 1997 and owned by Affymetrix, covered a method of analyzing complex mixtures of genes from biological samples by using chips containing many copies of pieces of DNA that hybridize to the genome of interest. The company has said that the patent does not exclude others from using the same technology, but critics have said that it infringes on other companies' patents and that the idea is already protected by prior art. The company is among the world's largest suppliers of genetic testing technology. The court ruled yesterday that the patent was "a patent in search of an invention." It said the patent failed to provide a mechanism that would allow scientists to efficiently read and analyze the data that the invention generated. The ruling is of immediate importance because it will invalidate more than a dozen patents that could be related to the gene chip technology. The court's decision was based on the Federal Circuit court's ruling. Gene Chip Ban The patent on the chip is unusual in being the only one that covers a method of analyzing DNA rather than a product. The decision, by three New York judges, was a victory for lawyers for the Public Patent Foundation, one of the most well-financed and active groups in the field, who challenged the patent on behalf of the National Coalition of American Nonsmokers (NCAN), the International Public Genetics Association, bioengineers at the University of California at Berkeley, the University of California at Santa Cruz and the University of Washington, biochemists at the University of Michigan, researchers at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute and law professors at the University of Pennsylvania. One of the judges on the panel was Judge Harold Baer, a patent expert appointed by President Reagan. The ruling comes as gene chip companies are under fire from several fronts. There has been a ban on federal funding of the research because of "gene patenting." A number of universities have refused to take new research grants from several companies in the field. In January, 683 prominent scientists and members of the International Society for Genome Research signed a letter saying that the patent system does not offer adequate incentives for technological innovation

I have tried everything: Cleaned environment, reinstalled R and RStudio. I also tried to install quantstrat 0.5.6 on other machines, with the same error and nothing happens. I made all these troubles for 10 hours and nothing happens. The only thing that I have found on the internet is that others people have had the same problem but they were not able to solve it. EDIT: I did a trick that I'm not sure if it works. I downloaded the package (extracted the package and I put all the quantstrat files in the folder that I have downloaded. A: The problem came with Rstudio, I didn't know that it affects the package that you install. Finally, I download the package from the url below.
