Getting the Guts Out of a Digital Camera A digital camera saves images as electronic information that, in turn, gets stored on some type of computer media such as a flash memory card, compact disc (CD), mini-disc (MD), or hard drive. To access the images, you need to transfer or transfer the digital images from the camera to the computer (see Figure 6-1). Illustrations by TechnoClef. Figure 6-1: A digital camera stores images on a computer. After the image is stored on the digital camera or an external drive, it's time to transfer the images to the computer using a cable-based method (see the nearby sidebar "Fitting a camera into the computer"). Alternatively, a wireless method of transferring images is available, and I talk about that in the "Transferring images using wireless" sidebar. If you wish to play with your images on the computer, you may like to know that many cheap USB drives from eBay offer good storage and come with handy software that you can use to play around with your images. I talk more about this type of technology in Chapter 15. For more information on transferring images from the camera to your computer, see Book I Chapter 4. The following sections cover how to turn on the camera, transfer the images, and use the camera to take different types of pictures. Exposing your camera properly When you first start photographing, you need to check whether your camera has an autoexposure system that automatically sets the camera for the best settings. Most modern cameras, such as a digital SLR camera, have an autoexposure system that automatically sets the camera to its ideal settings. If you don't have such a camera, you need to manually set the camera to a best-performing exposure mode. If you want to make certain that the camera has a fully automatic system, check out the camera's instruction manual that comes with the camera. To access the camera's manual, open the camera and look for the instruction manual that came with the camera. If your camera does have an autoexposure system, you can use the camera's

Q: One array structure for all data types I have been looking into the different variables of the type POINT, in order to identify the memory address of any variable. In this case I'm currently using the following code: POINT point; BYTE *pointer; Point p = (Point)&point; pointer = p.x; std::cout Points; The thing you should pay attention is the size of the array (3). More information about array here. A: The point.y and point.x are fields that have a static value (0, 0) Porching Porching is a form of skin disease that occurs in dogs as they grow older. It is characterized by shallow, long-lived lesions that may be painful and are often caused by a fungus, such as Histoplasma or Microsporum. Signs The exposed skin becomes dry, cracked and scaly. Causes The most common cause of porching is fungal infection. Other possible causes include a genetic problem or irritation due to allergies or dryness. Viral infections may also cause
