Perchloroethylene, also known as trichloroethylene, 1,2-dichloroethylene or tetrachloroethylene, is an organic compound that is in widespread use. It is also an environmental contaminant and as such is the subject of a significant amount of regulation. There is a great need for improved methods of making and recovering perchloroethylene. Most methods of making perchloroethylene are based on the chlorination of ethylene. Ethylene is obtained by the cracking of hydrocarbon feedstock, mainly ethane. The chlorination of ethylene to produce perchloroethylene is also carried out in the presence of hydrogen chloride. The chlorination of ethylene to produce perchloroethylene may be carried out in a variety of reactor types. However, most reactor types used commercially generate significant amounts of chlorinated by-products. The by-products are difficult to recover and the subsequent chlorinated by-products also contaminate the product stream. This presents a significant problem in the operation of such reactors in that they reduce the yield of the desired product, perchloroethylene. Accordingly, there is a significant need for improved methods of making perchloroethylene. Synthesis and immunosuppressive activities of biologically active stilbenoids. A series of resveratrol-type stilbenoids were synthesized and their abilities to induce the generation of TNF-alpha were investigated. The inhibitory activities on the proliferation of murine and human cells stimulated by Con A or LPS were also explored. The majority of the resveratrol-type stilbenoids exhibited a very mild immunosuppressive activity and could stimulate the generation of TNF-alpha. In particular, compound 15 showed a similar TNF-alpha activity as that of resveratrol. In addition, compound 15 was found to have the same extent of LPS-induced production of TNF-alpha as resveratrol. However, compounds 3 and
