The Saskatchewan Crown has apologized to a man who spent five years in prison after being convicted of sexually abusing a five-year-old girl. The man, who was not named in a statement released by the Crown on Wednesday, had completed his sentence in October 2013, when a new judge dismissed his guilty plea for gross indecency and freed him. The judge issued the dismissal after the Crown told the man it had no proof of any sexual abuse of the child, only that the man had molested her. The judge said the Crown had told him there were no eyewitnesses, but later produced one. "This witness did not clearly identify the accused as the perpetrator, and this witness' evidence was not supported by any other evidence," the judge ruled in his decision. The decision sparked an outcry from the man's family, who launched a campaign called Justice for Danny to try to keep him in jail. The case also drew attention to issues surrounding the use of expert witnesses in court. "I'm sorry for the injustice you experienced. I'm so sorry. And I apologize for the fact that your name was not being taken into consideration as a future risk to society," Crown prosecutor Jim Tracy said at a news conference. The Crown initially said the decision to drop the charges was made for reasons of justice. "I know that sounds like I'm trying to justify, but I'm not. The decision was made because the judge believed that the evidence that was before him was inadequate," Tracy said. "The integrity of the justice system was being called into question by the fact that a conviction would have been reversed. And by not reversing the conviction, it would have sent a message out to people that if you plead guilty, if you really are sorry, you can get out of this." Speaking for the first time, the victim and her mother told reporters that they wanted to accept
