Rates of chloramphenicol acetyltransferase gene transfer in human cells by recombinant amphotropic murine retrovirus. Lymphoblastoid cell lines derived from CEM and Ramos cell lines, which lack detectable levels of endogenous retrovirus, were infected with a recombinant murine amphotropic retrovirus (Ampho-HT), which contains the chloramphenicol acetyltransferase gene under the control of the mouse metallothionein IIA promoter. Analysis of numerous clones derived from both human cell lines revealed the following characteristics: (1) all clones exhibited 3- to 4-fold more amphotropic virus replication than did control clones; (2) all clones were positive for the presence of endogenous murine retrovirus genomes, but none expressed the endogenous retrovirus gag or env genes; (3) all clones were positive for the recombinant gene, but two of the clones contained no detectable levels of chloramphenicol acetyltransferase or demonstrated a marked reduction in its expression; and (4) in vitro transcript analysis of one of the non-producer clones revealed that the reduced level of chloramphenicol acetyltransferase expression was due to a transcriptionally competent gene but an unstable mRNA. These observations suggest that Ampho-HT-infected human cells contain a copy of endogenous retrovirus genomes that can support production of a transdu
