

Category:Year of birth missing (living people) Category:Living peopleTravelling through a barrio today, you will see that walls are plastered with cut out fabrics and posters of political cartoons depicting politicians. A common member of the state or national executive is depicted, often in a critical light, getting in shape with a set of dumbbells, or jogging in the middle of the street, or simply being held up by crooked arms. Such images are de rigueur in one of many many lectures taken up by the cartel of writers of political caricatures, in this case, the "Party of the Giant Mortar", or Peronistas del Ciclomorte, as they are known. With a huge truck, nicknamed "Christ the Redeemer", this is a perpetual festival in the barrio of "23 de Enero", in the neighbourhood of Santa Fe. The party's current leader is Héctor Tartaglia, a retired banker and popular TV show host of the country, who has increased his political capital over the years with a series of successful candidate campaigns for the post of governor of the province of Buenos Aires. But where he has excelled is in the barrio. He is "choso", or pardo, in barrio parlance, a freewheeling mix of generous pizzas, big afro and good banter. Choso Tartaglia, therefore, is the one that invites the chicos, or young hipsters, of the barrio, who mostly are "piedras", or stones, as the Calle 23 people see them. These are people who flaunt it, and it's a means of putting down their current political (or none) foes. This party carries out its oiks "maricones", or hetero males, in the gay bars of the barrio, and Saturdays become a school day for them as they start working on a new product of party propaganda, the "Printing service". This is a group of writers who dedicate themselves to the perpetual campaign, which is critical of the national and the provincial political situation. This is a rare case where the ranks are filled with characters of the traditional media, "telepeople", those who work on television, radio or newspapers. Is this a political party, then, or a press pressa, 570a42141b
