We evaluated whether this test has also diagnostic value in thyroid diseases. ESR was determined in 236 consecutive patients with well differentiated thyroid carcinoma and euthyroid nodular goitre (n = 83). ESR was also measured in 52 healthy volunteers (controls) and 39 patients with other inflammatory disorders (cases). The normal reference range was determined in healthy volunteers. In euthyroid goitre, mean ESR was 25.2 mm/h (range 5-95), and was significantly increased in cases of carcinoma, compared with euthyroid nodular goitre (45.2 vs. 19.6 mm/h, p 0.05). In conclusion, in euthyroid goitre, ESR appears to be a useful test of systemic inflammation. In thyroid carcinoma, ESR is significantly increased. Mean ESR is higher in male compared to female patients, suggesting that the test is gender-dependent.1.
