Is globalization bad for the poor? New evidence on the effect of U.S. trade and technology on development. The effects of globalization have been controversial because the evidence has been ambiguous, especially on the effects of U.S. trade and technology on development. We analyze a recently published data set that allows us to look at both impacts simultaneously. We find that U.S. import penetration raises labor productivity growth by 0.54 percentage points for advanced countries and lower labor productivity growth for less developed countries, offsetting all U.S. export penetration benefits. We provide new empirical evidence for the effect of U.S. technology on development. We show that the diffusion of U.S. technology into less developed countries increases both labor productivity growth by 0.16 percentage points and wages in non-textile-dominated sectors by 0.13 percentage points. The effect of technology on wages is negative for textile-dominated sectors and positive for non-textile-dominated sectors. More developed countries benefit from the diffusion of U.S. technology, whereas less developed countries lose productivity gains and experience a larger decline in wages. Overall, these results indicate that trade and technology are positively correlated with development, but the relationship is not one-to-one. While the diffusion of U.S. technology improves the development of less developed countries, it has a negative effect on the development of more developed countries.
