The present invention is directed to a method and system for connecting a peripheral device via an infrared (IR) connection to a computer system. The use of remote digital cameras for obtaining digital images from stationary or moving subjects is rapidly growing. Generally, these cameras can take still photographs, and in some cases, motion pictures. In order to obtain these images, the user typically connects the camera to a personal computer, which may, in turn, be connected to a video display screen for viewing images from the camera. The user can also connect the camera to a printer for printing images from the camera. One difficulty associated with these devices is that the camera is typically connected to a personal computer through a serial or parallel cable. Such cables, however, have a limited operational distance and, therefore, are not suitable for applications where the camera and computer need to be separated by large distances, such as in an auditorium, during a lecture, or in a television studio. Another difficulty is that cameras typically have a cable terminating into a male connector having a variety of forms, such as a Universal Serial Bus (USB) connector, or a mini d0c515b9f4
