citation and internal quotation marks omitted). In the context of VA compensation benefits, a claimant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that a current disability exists that began in active service. See Horn v. Shinseki, 25 Vet. App. 231, 234 (2011). The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit (Federal Circuit) has held that, for purposes of the "in-service incurrence or aggravation of an injury," a veteran must show that the veteran was injured in combat or that the claimed injuries occurred during a period of authorized active duty for training (ACDUTRA). See Miller v. West, 11 Vet. App. 340, 345-47 (1998); see also 38 C.F.R. § 3.304(f). "The rationale underlying the Federal Circuit's reasoning is that Congress's intention was to limit compensation to only those service members who actually incur a disability in the line of duty." Street, 9 Vet. App. 547, 549 (1996). Here, although there is a medical record reflecting that Mr. Smith was diagnosed with PTSD, the Board finds that Mr. Smith has not been shown to have engaged in combat with the enemy or to have sustained an ACDUTRA injury. There is no evidence in the record showing that Mr. Smith suffered from PTSD during his period of active service, and Mr. Smith does not assert that he was in combat during that period. Nor does the record show that Mr. Smith was injured while participating in ACDUTRA. Indeed, the record reflects that Mr. Smith was placed in a noncombat occupational specialty (signaling corpsman) and was not deployed overseas for a period of more than two years after his service. See e.g., Appellant's Brief at 6-7; see also United States Court of Appeals for Veterans Claims (Court) Rule 28(a)(3) (providing that the Court may take judicial notice of "matters of official records of the United States Court or its predecessor courts" because "the records of the latter courts... have long been considered part of the official records of the courts of the United States"). Accordingly, the Court finds that the Board did not err in determining that the preponderance of the evidence was against the claim. See

The economies of developing countries face increasing challenges due to high and persistent poverty. Youth unemployment is a serious problem especially in developing countries. It is a significant contributor to poverty, and the age-at-transition from employment to poverty is declining. The International Labour Organization (ILO) estimates that youth unemployment may reach 17 million in 2013, up from 6.2 million in 2008. The Arab League Social Affairs Commission estimate that, of a total of 18.2 million Arab youth of age 15–24 years, 3.5 million are unemployed, with the highest rates in North Africa and the Middle East. In view of such a development situation, there is a need for new approaches towards youth unemployment. For example, the ILO estimates that if the global youth employment rate continues at its current rate, it would rise to 80 percent by 2050, compared to 66 percent today. Empowering young people is thus important for the future of countries. Generally, a country's economy includes the private sector and the public sector. In a developing country, the public sector is generally small, as the developing country's focus is on the private sector. A public sector may provide for a minimum level of public services that are usually necessary to maintain public order, and the public sector may also provide services that may be desirable, but not essential, to the economy. Accordingly, new approaches are needed to address the needs and the expectations of the youth in a developing economy that are affected by this increasing youth unemployment problem.
