The use of hair-dyers' fixative solutions for the investigation of multiple forms of oxidative attack on hair proteins. The protein components of hair keratin are markedly and selectively affected by the presence of free radicals during oxidative insult of hair and wound healing. In order to assess the applicability of hair-dyers' fixative solutions for studies of protein oxidation in naturally-coloured hair, they were investigated. High performance liquid chromatography analysis of 20% 1-butanol (1-BuOH), 20% 1-propanol (1-PrOH) and 20% 1-butyl-2-methoxy-2-propyl ether (1-BuMeOEt) revealed the presence of >98% 1-BuOH, >61% 1-PrOH and >3% 1-BuMeOEt, respectively. In addition, the major free-radical scavenger uric acid was isolated in trace amounts in the 1-BuOH solution. By in vivo conditioning of the principal hair-forming region of a single human scalp, fixation with these solutions, followed by matrix-assisted laser desorption/ionization and electrospray ionization mass spectrometry, was used to demonstrate that at least one free-radical specie, predicted to be hydrogen peroxide and peroxyxynitrite, had penetrated into the cortex of naturally-coloured hair. Moreover, oxidation products detected included oxidized peptides, with heme-peptide being the dominant component, with or without the cysteinyl residue carbonyl-linked to its side-chain terminal. This approach provided a simple, repeatable and specific means of investigating stable oxidative modification of proteins of the hair and also provided an insight into catagen-like oxidative stress in naturally-coloured hair.
