the No. 1 island in the world — it's also the worst place on earth to be a bear, according to a new report in National Geographic.
Population growth has caused the number of bears living in Iceland to nearly double over the last four decades. The island nation is home to about 1,500 bears — 12 times the number of bears that lived there in the 1970s. As these critters encroach on human habitations, reports of bear-on-human conflicts have increased. In addition to being very territorial, beavers also produce eerily accurate rat-like squeaky sounds that can be heard from tens of yards away and make them unpredictable and dangerous prey for bears, according to the report. In addition, bears are attracted to trash, garbage cans and even refrigerators as spring plants sprout on the ground. In the summer, bears must survive on a diet of very little because of lack of natural food sources. Consequently, "some bears are not in good enough shape to survive and are forced to take to the human-dominated landscape," said National Geographic senior photographer Ben Moon. See also: Most Dangerous Animals in the World Moon, who spent 18 months photographing the bears, said conditions have also become difficult for the animals because climate change has reduced the availability of natural food. "The sea ice is breaking up in the Arctic as average winter temperatures in the central Arctic rise. This means there is less sea ice cover during the summer, leaving bears with empty bellies all summer," Moon told Mashable. Despite these challenges, the bears seem to be finding a way to adapt. "Bears can hibernate for up to 100 days and live through the winter when food is scarce. Their large body size enables them to store up plenty of fat in their bellies for the winter — and they can eat very well when the spring comes, feeding on abundant spring plants."
