Download episode book.Q: Issue with getting cursor position with Java Mouse API So I'm trying to use the Java Mouse API to get the cursor position using the following code: Mouse myMouse = Mouse.getMouse(); MousePointer mPointer = myMouse.getPointer(); int x = mPointer.getX(); int y = mPointer.getY(); This is not producing the expected output when run on my laptop. It works fine when run on my cellphone, but not on my laptop. I've previously run into a similar problem where I had to use a set of if statements and switch to get the x,y coordinates for my application. Is there a way of getting the cursor position without if statements or do I need to use that other method? A: The problem was solved by declaring the variables as ints instead of doubles. Double x = mPointer.getX(); Double y = mPointer.getY(); Thank you all for your help. the USGS has reported that most unusually warm years are no longer anomalous. What can we do? Some say we should hope for a warming in the future so it doesn't get as hot as it is now. Others say we should do everything we can to stop this from happening. Here's what I think. During the time when our historic temperature records were measured, the temperature was still rising. So even though the temperatures have already hit record levels, we still have a while to go before we have the highest temperatures in our lifetimes. If we can't stop the temperature from rising, we should take advantage of the situation and enjoy it. If, for example 0cc13bf012
