A survey of family medicine residents in Wisconsin using a computer-generated random sample. In 1989, 125 randomly selected residents from family medicine residency programs in Wisconsin were surveyed by telephone using a computer-generated questionnaire with random digit dialing. More than 30% of the respondents never, sometimes, or often misdiagnosed a history of fever as a symptom of influenza. The respondents' perception of the importance of family medicine as a subspecialty and the need for additional subspecialty training were reported by 50% of the respondents to be moderate or very moderate. Approximately a quarter of the respondents indicated that an improved ability to diagnose and treat patients could be expected within five years as a result of further training. The majority of the respondents felt that more time for clinical teaching was needed.

Approximately half of the residents indicated that residency programs should be strongly encouraged to adopt methods to recruit family medicine residents. The majority of the respondents felt that the percentage of family medicine residents entering general surgery residencies should be increased, whereas the majority of the respondents believed that the percentage entering internal medicine residency programs should be decreased. SAN FRANCISCO (Reuters) - The Trump administration on Wednesday effectively halted most visas for people from eight countries, and threatened to take action against a third, in response to a series of attacks in Britain in which Muslim men conducted separate incidents of arson, machete injuries and a van ramming. After an eight-month review of terror risk from the eight countries, the State Department listed Chad, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Syria, Yemen, Venezuela and North Korea as posing terrorist threat as a result of their large Muslim populations. It noted such an action would be the first in nearly a decade. The move is expected to profoundly affect the lives of residents of those countries, who are planning to come to the United States to study, visit family or marry U.S. residents. The action was first reported by the New York Times. "I was told this was the first time this was done in a long, long time, and the first time they're
