Systems having many identical components have a high risk that a single component failure will result in loss of the system. To reduce the overall risk in these systems, some prior art systems provide for excess redundancy. In these systems, multiple components are provided to perform the same function. For example, some systems may have two or more processors, or two or more power supplies. This multiple component redundancy reduces the likelihood that a particular component will fail. If one or more components fail, it is highly likely that a second component will compensate for the failure. The failure of one component, however, may cause additional system-wide problems, due to the dependency of the failed component on other system components.Magnitude and mechanism of inhibitory and excitatory postsynaptic responses in the turtle semicircular canal. A mechanism of inhibition in the turtle semicircular canal has been found that is probably due to the summation of both presynaptic and postsynaptic inhibition. The summation of inhibitory responses could be demonstrated by placing the postsynaptic activity potential in the presence of acetylcholine (ACh) in a second organ preparation. The summation of the two responses is excitatory in nature. The extent of the summation can be seen to decrease at lower stimulation rates. The summation of responses is further reduced by tetrodotoxin. In the presence of aminophylline, a phosphodiesterase inhibitor, there is little effect of summation on the inhibitory responses. The summation of responses produced by the summing of inhibitory responses takes place postsynaptically, and the inhibitory responses themselves are presynaptic.Hello, I am interested in understanding more about hiring and firing within NNG.
