September 2, 1954 September 3, 1954. The highest peak was outlined in backlit snow in a hazy dusk sky, glowing red-orange where it touched the lightning-bright air. The Milky Way shone like a long blue bar, hinting at the number of stars it contained. No stars shone there. It was the bright star The Peak of Eternal Light, ringed by black shadows. A gentle breeze blew the snowflakes away from the two climbers. The one sitting on top, his cigarette glowing red and the other with hands on hips, the cigarette smoke blowing away above. They were long odds at a hundred, he said. He had wanted to climb. He had wanted to see if he could. The hard throbbing began up below. How, he asked. To do what? To climb, to get to the top. To see if he could. They were out here in this darkness and danger. He was alone with no real way of knowing when the pack could come back to get him. There was one way, he said. If you make it. He said, Your nerve, to keep moving. The other man nodded. The thing is, he said, we were raised to believe the world was our plaything. Our son would play it. And that the world was stupid. That was why we got into it in the first place. They both knew he was smiling. He said, How? Mugging. He said, What? Nothing, he said. It was time to go. He stood up. They mounted their packs and began heading up the mountain. Follow the ridge, he said. They made it over the peak, which rose in a sharp, orderly line. The one on top paused. His eyes locked on the other, the cold lancing through him, his hands falling to the handle of his axe. He would stay until he knew, he said. He turned on his side and swung the axe.
