In a vehicle that is equipped with a multi-speed transmission (MST) such as an automatic transmission, gears are selected by a shift device (e.g., a shift lever or a pedal) to control the output power of the engine. There are various types of shift devices provided for a vehicle, for example, a conventional shift lever provided at a steering wheel, a shift pedal provided at a floor console, a shift switch provided at a display panel, and so on. A shift position of the shift device and a shift position (e.g., a parking range) that a driver wants to select are generally displayed on an indicator panel (e.g., a display panel provided on a vehicle dashboard). In the case that a shift position of the shift device is an upshift position, the shift position of the shift device needs to be shifted to an upshift position, for example, in the case that the driver rotates the shift lever toward the left of the shift device, or in the case that the driver moves a brake pedal from a brake position toward a brake pedal near the neutral position. In the case that a shift position of the shift device is a downshift position, the shift position of the shift device needs to be shifted to a downshift position, for example, in the case that the driver rotates the shift lever toward the right of the shift device, or in the case that the driver moves the brake pedal from the brake position toward a brake pedal near the neutral position. It is possible that when the shift position of the shift device is in a "D" range (a downshift position), for example, a driver wants to select a "P" range (a parking range) but the shift device is in a "P" range (a parking range) for example, or a driver does not want to select the "P" range (a parking range) while the shift position of the shift device is in a "P" range (a parking range). Therefore, JP2007-143233A discloses that a downshift position that a driver wants to select is displayed with a pictogram different from a downshift position other than the downshift position the driver wants to select, for example, the end of a shift lever is displayed with a pictogram different from the end of a shift lever. In JP2007-143233A, the downshift position that the driver wants to select is displayed with the

EMI Warns of Higher PICR Repricing Investors have been treading water in the face of margin calls and markets out of favor for more than a year. Like the unwary lambs waiting on the slaughterhouse floor, we investors are in the process of being handed the same dose of Peter Pan's serum. The big discount this morning on the 10-year Treasury is in the mix, along with the rapid weakening in equities. So many of us would like to place a protective order around the balance sheet, similar to the one that was set up after the 1929 crash. Yet none of us wants to do anything except ride out this next correction, or at least watch helplessly as others bet on stocks reaching new highs in late 2006. We've got several months before this ride is over. And there are several corners of the market that you must be protecting, both the high-volume volume investors and the more aggressive ones. Is the put protection window closing this morning? We'll have to see how the price action unfolds. Typically, the stock market rallies on news events. Equity markets roll over and we have our usual reactions. Then we get our news, we get our panic, we go into a new pattern in which there is risk-off, there is risk-on, and we buy Treasuries, equities, junk bonds, emerging markets and so forth. All the same, would you like to go back to January 24, when the broad market had just closed up 4.6% for the week? That was the day after the U.S. Congress passed the massive, federal budget bill for the years 2007-2011, as well as the large measure that initiated the troop escalation in Iraq. It was the day when Treasury yield on the 10-year note was at 3.46%. I started this column on Monday citing the 1,000-to-1 leverage that exists in the market. Now I'm explaining why the ratios of high-profile stocks to these yield levels are so high. After last Friday's price lows, the Dow is trading at 9,929.98. The S&P 500 is down at 1,074.93. The Nasdaq is down at 1,871.46. The VIX index is down at 51.20. As I write this, the 10-year yield is at 3.65% and no one seems to
