The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for testing a module in an electronic network. More particularly, the present invention relates to a method for testing a module in an electronic network, and an apparatus for testing a module in an electronic network, in which the testing of a module is facilitated by replacing electrical connections.

Digital subscriber line (DSL) communications provide high-speed data communication over telephone lines, such as the twisted pair lines installed in most homes and offices worldwide. Various DSL technologies are available, including asymmetric DSL (ADSL), DSL, high-bit-rate DSL (HDSL), very high-bit-rate DSL (VDSL), and very high-bit-rate DSL (VHDSL). Typically, ADSL, VDSL, and VHDSL use asymmetrical transmission modes, where data is transferred at a different bit rate over the upstream and downstream links. Data is transferred over the downstream link at the full bit rate of the circuit, and the DSL modem can be used to perform frequency and bit rate conversions. Data is transferred over the upstream link at a fraction of the rate of the downstream link, and the DSL modem may not perform any frequency conversion. In contrast, HDSL and VHDSL use symmetrical modes of data transfer. Accordingly, HDSL and VHDSL modems are capable of operating at various frequencies. Moreover, the bandwidth of the downstream and upstream links is the same. FIG. 1 illustrates a conventional test apparatus 10 for testing a module 12 in an electronic network, such as an ADSL communication link. The test apparatus 10 comprises a first socket 14 for receiving test signals, such as ADSL transmit signals, from a supplier of the module 12, and a second socket 18 for receiving test signals, such as ADSL receive signals, from the module 12. The test apparatus 10 further includes a power supply 20 for providing electrical power to the module 12, and a coupler 22 for conveying the test signals received from the supplier of the module 12 to the second socket 18. According to FIG. 1, the test apparatus 10 has a limited number of interfaces to enable testing of the module 12 in various network configurations. In particular, according to FIG. 1, the test apparatus 10 is limited

The question is clearly off-topic on this site, but he was also asked why he was asking the question on this site. The accepted answer to this question was quite disappointing. Given that, I wonder if the question should be closed or not. A: The "why" question being asked is wrong, but the discussion surrounding it is not off topic. The answer to the original question of "is this a good choice of cars" is relevant to every question asked about car purchases. My personal stance would be to vote to close the "why" question as "unclear what you're asking" as that is the standard reason. For folks to answer this question they'd have to make assumptions about what the OP meant and that's just wrong. Instead of the "why" question, answer the "why" question by explaining that this site isn't the place to ask about buying used vehicles. In the answers to this question, others have explained why the question is not on-topic and instead should be asked on a cars and maintenance site. A: No. It should be closed as a duplicate, as it is the original of the "how do I know if it's a good choice of cars?" type questions.

Are questions about buying a used car off-topic on this site? There is a question for that exact reason: Why would I ask a question that could be applied to the entire existence of the internet?
