CARACAS (Reuters) - Venezuelan President Nicolas Maduro ordered the military on Monday to cut ties with the opposition-run congress and said he was considering blocking their activities and dissolving the legislative assembly, but many doubt his power to take such actions. Venezuelan President Nicolas Maduro speaks during a meeting of the United Socialist Party of Venezuela in Caracas, Venezuela January 30, 2019. REUTERS/Carlos Garcia Rawlins A power struggle has raged in the nation of 30 million people in which the political opposition has consistently chipped away at Maduro's control of state institutions. He is struggling to remain in office after a wave of protests that started in April in response to a Supreme Court decision to strip him of his powers. Maduro, who has the support of the military, has accused the opposition of a coup plot and said the protests were backed by the United States. The tensions have spilled over into government-controlled institutions, including the judiciary, where the Supreme Court has shut down courts, seized weapons and arrested critics. Maduro said on state television on Monday that he was considering taking over all legislative bodies in the country, a move that would have the power to overrule the National Assembly. "Yes, we're thinking about that, but I won't do anything without previous discussion and permission," Maduro said during a meeting with the heads of state-run oil company PDVSA. The opposition-dominated congress has backed calls from the opposition-led National Assembly to take over legislative powers after the Supreme Court ruled the opposition leader Juan Guaido
