The advantages of LEDs include a long life, a soft light, a compact volume, low power consumption, environmental protection, etc. Being a new energy source, the application of LEDs continues. A number of LED application products have appeared on the market recently. In late years, the usage of TVs has been increased by demand for displaying material of various contents due to the development of video communication. As a result of this, the load applied on the light-emitting diode (LED) of a backlight light source is high. The conventional solution mainly used in backlight light source is to use a single LED module to form a LED tube. The LED tube is a high-power consuming tube that can only bear a relatively low load. To enhance the application thereof, the conventional LED module has to use a more powerful LED component. However, this will increase the material cost and the size of a LED module, so that the LED tube, with low structure strength and large volume, cannot stand too high a power consumption and it is limited in application due to the inconvenience in the installation. In addition, when high-power LEDs are used, the heat produced by the LED is very large, and it needs heat dissipation means to effectively dissipate the heat. However, in the conventional LED tube, the heat dissipation performance of the tube is poor. Therefore, in the conventional LED tube, the heat produced by the high-power LEDs needs to be dissipated. The most common way is to use an air-cooling heat dissipation mechanism, and the best solution is to change the cooling heat dissipation mechanism to an active cooling system so as to reduce the electromagnetic interference and enhance the stability of the product. A typical active cooling system is a 6d1f23a050
