The document, called A Blockchain White Paper, outlines the features and the benefits of the tech. The document was released on Sunday. The UK-based creators have also opened the first of an entire "Blockchain studio", to be based in London. This will allow the team to create a range of tools and services for businesses to use the technology. They plan to help develop a proof-of-concept system to demonstrate the technology in a live environment. The first of the three stages of this project will begin in February and will include the creation of three legal entities: a company, a cooperative and a foundation. How it works The paper argues the technology's features could revolutionise the financial system, but that it is still at an early stage. The technology will allow anyone to transfer funds directly across networks of computers, or "blockchain", and could become a new standard for how we use the internet. The system was first used to secure records during the 2008 financial crisis to stop organisations cheating in electronic trading. A computer game that uses the technology has raised more than $30m (£19.2m) in a crowd-funding campaign called Ethereum Classic. The team behind this is called Ethereum, a fork of Bitcoin and allows people to create new currencies from any other ideas. In total, more than 90,000 backers have invested in the project. The creators also point out that although this technology could replace cryptocurrencies like Bitcoin, it may also be used to create new types of currencies. They say the technology "could be used as the foundation of a global financial settlement system, and by so doing, vastly reduce the cost of traditional financial settlement systems". Future use But the system could also be used to more directly help one user's finances. The creators point out that it could be used to give people an automatic interest payment and would give the person access to "any" money and any interest that they earn or lose. "This could be used to solve the "tax" problem... globally, and for everyone," they write. "We 6d1f23a050
