Prevents the message view from being updated with new dataÂ .A significant increase in the use of cannabis is associated with an increased risk of psychosis, according to a new study published in The Lancet Psychiatry. Researchers from the University of Adelaide and the University of Warwick found that the use of cannabis in adolescence was associated with an increased risk of developing a psychotic disorder, including schizophrenia, over the next decade. The authors were able to estimate the impact of cannabis use using data from two nationwide longitudinal surveys: the South Australian Health Omnibus Survey and the National Survey of Mental Health and Wellbeing. The study found those who had used cannabis in the past three months had a 19 percent increase in risk for developing psychosis compared to those who had never used cannabis. These results were robust to the inclusion of a range of potentially confounding variables such as age, sex, mental health, pregnancy, ethnicity, partner relationship, psychiatric family history, place of residence and housing status. "The results should be interpreted as an indication of the relative importance of cannabis as a risk factor for psychosis, that is, not that cannabis by itself makes anyone psychotic, but that cannabis use increases the relative risk of having a psychotic disorder," explained lead author Jelier Bos, a Research Fellow with the University of Adelaide's Department of Medicine. "We really can't say how cannabis exposure directly causes people to become psychotic.
