A: So the solution might be to use a single loop (i.e. not two) where you can extract the txt from each csv file and then do whatever you need to do to it. I would suggest a loop like so: `data_file = ['file1.txt', 'file2.txt'] files = [] for f in data_file: with open(f, 'r') as fd: data = fd.read() with open(f, 'w') as fd: fd.write(data) files.append(f) for f in files: print(f)` The reason this will work is that each iteration of the loop will overwrite the file, overwriting the one that was read in with the most recent file in the `data_file` list. Note that I haven't tested this in a while, and I'm not sure this will work as intended under some situations (if csv files have some sort of header or if the files aren't in order) - if this does not work, please post the output of more information from your error log (if you can figure out how to do it. The present invention relates to an integrated circuit containing a test mode function, and to a production method thereof. It is known in the art to apply a laser to a semiconductor integrated circuit before packaging to burn out some of the transistors to perform testing. Conventionally, a circuit configuration to have a fuse logic circuit in addition to the main circuit is used in order to perform such testing, and to set or to reset a predetermined state by blowing off a fuse to set a test mode, thus enabling testing. There are several methods of blowing off a fuse in such a circuit configuration. As a first method, a fuse is blown off by laser radiation, or by means of an FIB which is a charged particle beam. A second method is a method of blowing off a fuse with the current supplied by a voltage applied to the circuit, or with a voltage externally applied to the circuit. The second method cannot be used in the case of a laser circuit since voltage is likely to be applied to the circuit and the built-in circuit is damaged by the laser radiation. On the other hand, a laser circuit can be used in the
