Sensory systems in birds have been extensively studied, yet little is known about the neural mechanisms by which birds sense important environmental cues, such as sound and visual cues. When circumstances require it, birds are capable of adjusting their position and speed in space to quickly respond to changes in the surrounding acoustic and visual environments. Specifically, songbirds are capable of adjusting song and other vocalizations to the detect changes in the song of conspecifics, and the visual and auditory environments. Despite this behavioral flexibility, the central mechanisms controlling songbird auditory sensitivity are still not fully understood. Previous studies have shown that songbirds are capable of rapidly adjusting their auditory sensitivity to the local auditory environment. In contrast, little is known about how songbirds can rapidly adjust visual sensitivity. Therefore, I conducted experiments to study if the anatomical specializations and the neural mechanisms controlling visual and auditory sensitivity in songbirds are the same or different. Specifically, I used the wood thrush (Hylocichla mustelina) songbird. In addition, I also investigated how the auditory and visual systems are linked with each other. I found that the auditory sensitivity was significantly enhanced in darkness and that there is no correlation between the auditory and visual thresholds. These results indicate that the anatomical specializations of the songbird visual and auditory systems are not the same. Furthermore, I found that the anatomical connections between the optic tectum and the auditory system innervate the field L, which encodes the pitch 6d1f23a050
