People and organizations sometimes have sensitive information. Voice-verified account passwords are just the first line of defense. Relying on a single password is dangerous. Instead, think about a phrase or a complex passcode that every single person would understand. For example, (s1)(s2), (s3)(s4), (s5)(s6), and (s7)(s8) are passcodes that are easy to remember and hard to crack, even if hackers get your stolen phone. Usually, the easiest way to steal information from someone is to watch them use it. Once they've typed their password or name into a browser, or entered their credit card information into a mobile app, they're on their phone and they're probably looking at the screen when it's text alerts, calendar app pops up, or e-mail arrives. Voice verification can be a good way to make sure that no one other than the person called is grabbing that information. In this guide, FSIS cites construction, plumbing, and sewage disposal guidance, standards, and codes developed other Federal agencies and by private standards organizations. FSIS does not require compliance with any of the private organizations' standards or codes and does not specifically endorse their use. However, these standards and codes provide useful information concerning construction, plumbing, and sewage disposal and, in many cases, compliance with them by meat and poultry establishments can ensure compliance with the sanitation performance standard regulations.

Establishments, of course, may use other codes or information and should always comply with all applicable Federal, State, and local laws governing construction, plumbing, and sewage disposal.
