This compound was initially discovered in the late 1980s and has been implicated in an increasing number of human diseases, including asthma, allergic rhinitis, atopic dermatitis, and rheumatoid arthritis (1, 2). LTD4 has been reported to activate and/or modulate a number of signaling pathways, including G protein-coupled receptors (3–9), chemoattractant receptors (10–12), and G protein-independent receptors (13–16). LTD4 is also known to initiate and/or modulate processes such as bronchoconstriction (17), inflammation (3–10), vascular smooth muscle contraction (13, 14), and immune cell migration (12, 14). LTD4 is well known to act through the BLT2 and CysLT receptor family (18–19). Of these receptors, BLT2 is expressed predominantly in leukocytes, while CysLT1 is expressed in cells of the immune system, including mast cells, basophils, eosinophils, T cells, and NK cells (20, 21). The BLT2 receptor has been most extensively characterized, and its activation has been shown to have diverse biological effects through the activation of G protein-dependent and G 04aeff104c
