To get 50.4, you need to do some work and download some programs. Assuming you have a blank image document, the first thing to do is to open Photoshop and check to see if you have any updates to install using the Help menu . The first Adobe Photoshop for the web launched in 2016. The quality and functionality of the original Web-only Photoshop experience was so high that this was truly a web application without compromise. But Photoshop apps require a robust backend, and developing a robust backend for a single user can be a challenge. WebAssembly brought some huge benefits to the web, and that's why we decided to bring Photoshop mainstream. The new portability and performance of WebAssembly enabled a more scalable version of the Photoshop web app, and it accelerated the work for our technical team—particularly the back-end. The original application relied on the Adobe Flash runtime, which is a browser plug-in. As browser support for the Flash plug-in has decreased over the years, we began to see fewer opportunities for developers to use Flash. And with the emergence of HTML5 solutions, like WebAssembly, that were mobile friendly, we knew investing in Flash wasn't the best use of our engineers' time. We started looking for an alternative WebRuntime. In January 2019, we switched to the Chromium Embedded Framework (CEF), which runs entirely in the browser. This allowed us to take advantage of all HTML5 and JavaScript APIs for our web application. e3d0a04c9c
